Information about our accounting process

Further to various questions that we received from various customers; we inform you about a special subject from the GDPR called the processing agreement.

What is a data controller?

On the basis of the GDPR, everyone who processes personal data of persons must handle this carefully. The GDPR gives a number of standards for this. For example, with regard to the security of this data. The regulation also prescribes what needs to be done when unauthorized persons take note of these data. The GDPR therefore imposes obligations on the organisation responsible for processing of the personal data. The GDPR therefore calls these organisations the Data Controller.

What is a processing agreement?

It regularly occurs that a data controller engages another organisation to carry out certain activities on its behalf. We clarify this with an example. A consumer requests an information brochure from a company about bathrooms. The bathroom manufacturer has agreed with his advertising agency that all applications are sent to this advertising agency and that this advertising agency then sends the brochures. However, the advertising agency needs the personal data received by the bathroom manufacturer. In that case, the GDPR requires the bathroom manufacturer to conclude a written agreement with the advertising agency which establishes exactly what the advertising agency can and cannot do with these address data. The advertising agency should also warn the bathroom manufacturer when this data may have come into the hands of unauthorized persons.

Acting on behalf of the data controller: processing agreement needed

According to the GDPR, a processing agreement should only be concluded when an organisation engages a third party to carry out its work on its behalf. The distinction between performing work "on behalf of" someone and "at the request of" someone is decisive.

What about the processing of the administration?

This question is regularly asked. You have asked us to process your data. For the data that we receive from you and your company and which are necessary to provide good advice or to carry out the administration, we are data controller. On this basis, we are self-accountable to the fact that we must handle these data carefully. A processing agreement between you and our office is therefore not necessary.
